others.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Well, which one was not?

SENATOR BRUNING: I have no idea, I don't have a list, Senator.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: So you can't say that for sure then, can you?

SENATOR BRUNING: Can you?

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Sure, I...

SENATOR BRUNING: Okay.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...I just said it. All of them were from two-parent families.

SENATOR BRUNING: All right, I'll take your word for it.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: All right now, why do people always say that if somebody is a fatherless child, such and such a thing is going to happen? Why...that's something people always say. Why do they say that?

SENATOR BRUNING: Well, let me get you the studies here, Senator. I'll (inaudible).

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Well, let's not go...did the Menendez brothers, were they fatherless children? I mean before they killed their parents? (Laughter)

SENATOR BRUNING: I...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Two parents. There was a guy who was...I think he was in that very important family that had a whole lot of money and he dealt in wrestling, and he had this big old country estate, and he murdered a guy, and he was from a two-parent family and they were rich. The point I'm getting to is that stereotypes often are used to try to support a position, but the stereotype is often insulting and demeaning to people who are situated in the circumstances that the stereotype is supposedly addressing, suggesting that people in that situation
